From The President

by Daniel Fowler

By late August, independent crop consultants often feel the wear and tear of a long summer. The grind is real, and if you have any interns and scouts heading back to school, the workload shifts squarely onto our shoulders. Most years, by mid-August, a portion of the crop reaches a stage where pest pressure drops off, allowing us to remove those fields from weekly scouting routes. But 2025 has been anything but typical.

Happenings on the Hill

by Keith Jones

September finds the D.C., Maryland, and Virginia region stuck in an unusual fall drought, making even this native Oklahoman long for cooler temperatures and moisture-laden storms. Beyond the country's fraught cultural moment, we also find House Members, Senators, and staff navigating a series of serious policy challenges faced by farmers, ranchers, agribusinesses, and rural communities across the country. I will unpack these below.
